the discovery of mmumied bodies in the Convent of San

Deminge, new being partly demolished, in that city:—
The bodies which have been exhumed by the interventor of that building can be seen in the funeral chapel of that building. Their number is fourteen. The violent attitude in which they are, the painful expression and murcular contractions they still exhibit, show plainly enough that they were never buried in comms, but were the victims of priestly inquisitorial crime. All suppose these akelsons to have belonged to unfortunate creatures who were buried alive, and the circumstance that they were taken out of walls, coffinless and unattended by any indication favorable to that class which leaves among us such terrible reminders, compels us to coincide in the general opinion.

smong us such terrible reminders, compels us to coincide in the general opinion.

Let the curious come to that asylum of the inquisitors and be convinced, like us, what the agony of suffocation is, and the horrible tortures attendant on the frightful punishment of immurage, which have left such foarful traces on those spectres. No cofin could possibly be shaped to adapt itself to the contersions those untouched bones present.

shaped to adapt itself to the contersions those untouched bones present.

It is the hand of the inquisition, the first page of our religious history following on the conquest of Mexico, which has murdered those men. Their remains, preserved from contact with the atmosphere, were enabled to present the phenomenon of munmification, although several of them have been for some time past exposed, after their exhumation, as we have been informed, to the effects of a most poisonous air, in order to efface, if possible, those proofs of inquisitorial infamy.

The editor of the Boletin de Noticias, who likewise paid them a visit, makes substantially the same remarks.

Another paper mentions the fact that the bodies of six infants, in coffins, were found in the wall of another convent.
